low to suggest that while the President says that the colored men should have political and economic equality it would be impossible to have either if he were regarded as a social inferior.

Again the President says, "Racial amalgamation there cannot be." Evidently Mr. Harding did not have an audience. "Race amalgamation, there cannot be" and close his eyes to millions of initiates in this country who represent in fact all the white race. We ardently believe that the colored people should divide their votes, but we should have been elected rather than after it.

"One thing we must meet seriously," Mr. Harding told us last night, "is the development of our country's 'organism'—the 'country'—the 'people'—against the very thing which he has previously argued-for. There are just as many differences between the individuals of any one race as there are between different races. The differences between the 'people' are different."
